Message from the Collection Editors

Dear Colleagues,

This Special Issue is devoted to experimental research in social sciences. Empirical, theoretical and methodological contributions are welcome, as well as submissions concerning ethical aspects of experimental studies. Experimental research is considered broadly and may include classical experiments, quasi-experimental field tests, game experiments, ‘natural’ experiments, simulations, and thought experiments, among others. We also welcome reviews and meta-reviews of experimental studies and their findings. We will consider numerous types of experiments, such as laboratory and field experiments, and quasi-experimental comparisons.

Experimental sociology has a long history. Experimental social sciences form an interdisciplinary area that connects sociological questions to social psychological underpinnings and economic conditions. Classical issues from norms to social roles and trust to morality can be intersected in studies of social action and interaction at micro and/or macro levels.
